

Australia. Wage subsidies worth $1.3 billion are being committed to fend off financial impact of coronavirus

The Morrison government will fund $1.3 billion in wage subsidies for small businesses to keep apprentices employed in the face of the coronavirus outbreak.

Small businesses will receive government-funded wage subsidies to keep apprentices at work as part of Australia's COVID-19 response.

As well, media reports suggest pensioners and welfare recipients will get cash payments of around $500.

Under the plan unveiled on Wednesday night, the government will offer small businesses up to $7,000 each quarter for every apprentice in wage assistance, to retain existing apprentices and trainees...
